three figures ascelling at her bedside; the mother broken-hearted at her great loss, the father cursing himself for her untimely end, and the young lover praying the dear Lord to take him to his beloved one. Well, dear, it was a tegrible time, they say. The father and the mother lived on into a lonely old age, but Royal Stanton never railled from the sheek, and less than a year lay beside the girl he oved better than life Yes, dear, it was heart disease. She had been subject to attacks when a little-child, but was thought to have outgrown

As Virgie walked through the hall that night sie imagined it peopled in all the shadowy corners with old-time courtiers and belowdered dames. She functed and bepowdered dames. She innered Virginia on the night of her death walking slowly and sailly up the great, broad stair-way, her long, white gown trailing behind Early the next morning found her again in the attic, hovering over the old cedar hest. Such strong, mainly letters as they core, every line replace with tendemess or the girl he loved; such beautiful plans for their future, the years were to be like an exquisite dream. Among them lay a small packet, tied with faded violet ribbons. With trembling fingers she unfastened the lovers' knot, thinking of the other dainty white ones which had tied them.

other dainty white ones which had tied them so long ago.

It contained a miniature of a young man, in the contained a miniature of a young man, in the continental dress, his high-bred, haughty face softened by the tender mouth and beautiful eyes. Such a gay picture it was, with its flowing laces and picmed hat. The girl sat as if be withched by the deep, dark eyes looking into hers. She knew that this must be Royal Stanion, her great-aunt's lover.

Now she knew why the Virginia of long ago ching so to this man. Hew could she ago clung so to this man. How could she help it? He was a man to the heart's core; manly man, with a heart as tender as a ransom," thought the young girl, as she gazed at the old-fashioned miniature.

gazed at the old-fashioned ministure.

"Men are not like that newadays," sighed Virgie, as she clored the chest. They have not the old-time bravery; they not less value on love. Oh, how I would honor such a man."

And all that evening a pair of dark eyes, gazing out from under a plumed bat, danced before her on the pages of the music, as she played rofitly to herself, that she might dream on undisturbed by the voices in the drawing-room. In her dreams that night the same pair of dark dreams that night the came pair of dark eyes haunted her. She lived for days in the midst of what she had read and heard.

The old house was full of memontoes of the days when the lovers had lived and loved, just as young people do now. It seemed as if she were under a speil and almost dreaded the awakening The season was full of gayety. She went verywhere, but enjoyed nothing with the test of former days.

Her young friends remarked on her quiet ways, and with a supreme effort she aroused herself to appear with something at least of her old-time gayety. Several weeks later there was considerable excitement among the young people occasioned by the rumors of a Washington birthday party, to be given in the old Town Hall, under the chaperomage of several of the most exclusive society ladias. There was running in at all hours upon friends and acquaintances in the quest of bits of old-time finery.

The few fortunate ones who possessed hericoms displayed them with pride Mrs. Carrer was besieged, and with her usual good nature, opened trunks and boxes to be tossed over by the girls. The old cedar chest Virgie guarded jealousy. At last the eventful night arrived, cold and moonlight, a night just fit for such revels. The sleigh stood at the door, Mrs. Car-ter and Tom were awaiting Virgle's appearance. They heard her light footfall on the They beard her light footnal on the stairs, but neither spoke.

Mrs. Carter could only gasp, and Tom blew a long whistle.

There she stood, the beautiful Virginia Carter of olden days stepped out of the golden frame. The same sweet face, the identical gown, soft, gauzy, white, over which ran stripes of dull pink roses. High-hesded satin slipers, with their immense jeweled buckles, encased her small feet, the brown hair piled high on her graceful head, caught by a snood of pink ribbons.

"Will I do?" she asked, laughing softly at their dismay.

"bot I say, Virg. you're a beauty!" says Tom with decision. "Oh, my dear, my dear, I den't like to

There was something familiar about the tall commanding figure; his black velvet cont and knee breeches were in the spirit of the day.

At her approach they turned toward her.

One look into his face, and it seemed as if her heart would never beat again. She felt she must be going mad, and tried to arouse herself, but the dark eyes bent upon to leave Washington at 7:00 a.m. Later tours. August 22, September 7, and October 8.
